Ever since the scope of the state’s budget deficit was brought home to us in the form of mandates to make cuts, my agenda has been dominated by the fiscal crisis. Last month, I told you about the mid-year reductions made to date. Now the administrative staff and I have turned our attention to next year. Working in conjunction with constituent groups on campus, we’re looking at ways to preserve funds and reduce costs in anticipation of next year’s “bad news.”

It’s not easy to beat the drum each week about budget cuts. That’s why it gives me pleasure to tell you about an event we held on campus recently that may hold some hope for our future. Mission College had the honor of hosting a workshop on college advancement. About 50 people attended, representing all nine district colleges.

College advancement can be defined as the teaming of certain units within the college to work together in support of resource development. That is, in bringing additional funds to the college. That could take many forms: private donations; government grants; partnerships with private industry. Chancellor Mark Drummond views this as a crucial strategy for the future of our colleges. He is strongly urging all nine colleges to create advancement teams, typically consisting of grant writers, Foundation members, research deans and public relations directors. Dr. Drummond has asked me to take the lead in a districtwide effort which we hope will lead to advancement teams on every campus.

Given the cyclical nature of California’s economy and the fact that community colleges are completely dependent on the state for funding, it behooves us at Mission College to embrace an advancement strategy. At our recent meeting, we heard from a dynamic speaker, Dr. David Daniel, president of Midland College in Texas, who has raised millions – yes, millions – in private funds for the two-year college.

That bar is too high for us right now at Mission. But we have an excellent base in our grant development. Despite our size, we lead the district in securing government grants, most of them workforce-related. We must turn our attention now to the private sector and employing some of the strategies outlined by Dr. Daniel.

Clearly, we serve the public and thus the tax base will forever form the core of our funding. But as we’ve painfully learned this year, it would be great to have an account at a second bank. An advancement strategy just might create that fund for us.
MISSION PEOPLE

Child development instructor Julie Ruelas has a new address: it’s San Fernando City Hall. Ruelas was elected to the city council in last week’s municipal election as the top vote getter among five candidates. Her issue priorities include making the city more responsive to citizen requests and more programs for older teens. Ruelas feels strongly about parenting classes for all couples – not just troubled families. Neither her students nor fellow instructors need worry. Mission College isn’t losing Julie – just sharing her with her new constituents.

Gwen Walker is the recipient of the Ida B. Kinney Excellence in Education Award for her commitment to the many students she has counseled over the years. The National Council of Negro Women presented the award. Walker has been with LAMC since 1975 and head of its counseling department since 1993.

The Ida B. Kinney award is given to individuals who are dedicated to education and to increasing opportunities for African American and other students. It is named for Mother Ida B. Kinney, the community activist who helped build the first black church in Pacoima. L.A. City Council President Alex Padilla presented the award to Walker at a Black History Month forum on the campus.

It’s been a few years since the publication of “Delano,” Instructor John Orozco’s satirical novel about growing up in the 60’s and 70’s. But like a parent who gets an occasional phone call from a grown child who’s left home, Orozco recently heard from his offspring. Orozco reports that “Delano” has just been ranked second on Amazon.com’s list of the most popular satires.

Orozco said that even though the book was published in 1999, it recently received two “sensational” reviews. Its public recognition has grown steadily since, he said.

Faculty members have paid tribute to former colleague Neil Farren, who passed away on February 8. Born and educated in the East Coast, Farren served as a Vincentian priest before turning to education. During a 30-year career with the Los Angeles Community College District, Farren served as a professor of philosophy and administrator of overseas education programs. In addition to Mission College (1985-95), Farren also served at Harbor, Trade Tech and Valley colleges. He continued to teach at Mission on an adjunct basis until last semester.

The California Community College Association for Occupational Education has praised a LAMC program for its innovative approach to job training. CCCAOE has nominated the Clerical Office Assistant Program for its outstanding workforce program award. The program has trained 150 low-income people in office skills, placing more than half in jobs where they earn at least $10 an hour, said Susan Rhi-Kleinert, program director.

existing businesses expand their markets to Mexico under NAFTA, and, of course, create more jobs.”

Zayas said the program is expected to begin in July. Program logistics must still be worked out with the government agency assigned to oversee the project, he added.

The grant proposal was written by business instructor Vilma Bernal and Youngh-Ji Lee, specially funded programs specialist.

TALK OF WAR

Student Bob Lentz dons bandages and “blood-stained” suit to become the “Master of War.” Lentz gave the ‘thumbs down’ to war in Iraq during an open forum in a political science class taught by Professor Charles Dirks (back).
